

Contents

Chapter 1: The Lamp

Chapter 2: The Ledger

Chapter 3: A Letter Inland

Chapter 4: The Storm

Chapter 5: Morning

Chapter 6: The Relief Boat

Chapter 1: The Lamp

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Chapter 2: The Ledger

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Chapter 3: A Letter Inland

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Chapter 4: The Storm

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Chapter 5: Morning

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Chapter 6: The Relief Boat

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.