

Contents

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

Preface

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

1.1 The Horizon

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

1.2 Stars and Their Names

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

1.3 The Sun at Noon

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

2.1 The Sextant

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

2.2 Chronometers

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

2.3 The Compass

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

3.1 Latitude by Meridian

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

3.2 Longitude by Time

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

3.3 Running Fixes

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.

The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge. The lamp had burned every night for forty years, and every night the keeper climbed the iron stairs to trim the wick. Below him the sea turned over in its sleep, grey and patient, and the gulls settled along the rail like punctuation. He kept a ledger of ships and weather, and in the margins he wrote small notes to his daughter, who lived far inland and had never seen a wave taller than a hedge.